pakistan has long suffered from high inflation led by soaring food prices which has increased poverty levels according to the united nations 2011 human development report half the population suffers deprivations of all types only half is literate even then there are only 12 million television sets surely a desirable medium for those who cannot read one for every 14 people this means a lot of communal watching of mostly state owned channels of the pakistan broadcasting corporation ptv at present the only other terrestrial television channel is the privately owned atv in which ptv and the pakistan broadcasting corporation are majority 80 percent shareholders the sameness is deafening however urban pakistanis are getting richer and spending money on alternatives thus ptv has ceded ground to more than 20 privately owned broadcasters with 89 domestic and 26 foreign channels with national television viewing split evenly between terrestrial on the one hand and cable and satellite on the other this proliferation of channels has enabled pakistani media to wield more influence over politics and public discourse than ever before with this growing influence comes however a corresponding increase in attempts by the government to control media outlets indeed state coercion and increasing censorship are among the greatest pressures on the media industry this book is kaleidoscope of the lives of pakistani women living their daily lives but i had to find the voice to do so in fact i had not only to find a voice in a literary sense i had to learn to speak first of all acknowledging that the pakistani womens experiences had never been represented or acknowledged we are not recognized for who we are we needed a vocabulary to bring us out of the shadows my choice of these particular women was the peculiar mixture of fragility and courage i sensed in them and a willingness to share their experiences initially they felt they had nothing of any consequence to say i have lived a very ordinary life nothing special that is worth mentioning was their initial response but as their stories began to unfold revealing a saga of silent metamorphosis their journey toward self discovery had begun they had a world to say and the world needed them to say it
