market efficiency and the capital asset pricing model capm numerous apparent exceptions to the capm have been observed with the risk adjusted outperformance of small cap stocks over large cap stocks being the most commonly cited anomaly the bulk of the research to date on this topic has found excess returns for stocks below a certain size threshold the authors conducted two studies one in november 2009 and another in november 2010 to analyze valuations in a number of developed markets in europe and asia across the market cap spectrum the 2010 study included canada and the usa in addition to asian and european markets while capm would lead one to expect a gradual decline in valuations as one looks at smaller and smaller stocks given that beta is typically higher for smaller cap stocks the research in this paper shows that valuations do not correlate with company size in a smooth fashion and that there is a kink point below which companies become cheaper faster than the capm would predict the authors posit that the valuation anomaly described by these kink points could help explain the existence of the small cap performance anomaly and that the institutional behavior that probably creates these kink points is difficult to change which could help explain why the small cap anomaly has persisted despite ample information on the topic to assess the performance of small cap stocks net of transaction costs we analyze 165 actively managed small cap oriented portfolios our analysis addresses three areas of interest i performance net of transaction costs ii the magnitude of trading costs incurred when rebalancing an actively managed portfolio and iii the potential for momentum strategy profits when investing in small cap stocks using conditional estimation we find that small cap funds have earned a significantly positive abnormal return of about 2 percent per year in the period january 1986 to december 2000 we also estimate the cost of january rebalancing to be 0.4 percent of portfolio value a value that is significant for over 20 percent of the portfolios under study finally after trading frictions are taken into account we find evidence that small cap portfolios exhibit significant return patterns similar in nature to momentum patterns initially documented in a frictionless setting by Jegadeesh and Titman 1993 2001 our findings support recent behavioral models which attempt to explain these patterns consistent with the findings of Jegadeesh and Titman we find that past winners continue to outperform in the next 12 months followed by a performance reversal
