the january afternoon was passing into night the air was cold and still so still that not a single twig of the naked beech trees stirred on the grass of the meadows lay a thin white rime half frost half snow the firs stood out blackly against a steel hued sky and over the tallest of them hung a single star past these bordering firs there ran a road on which in this evening of the opening of our story a young man stood irresolute glancing now to the right and now to the left to his right were two stately gates of iron fantastically wrought supported by stone pillars on whose summits stood griffins of black marble embracing coats of arms and banners inscribed with the device per ardua ad astra beyond these gates ran a broad carriage drive lined on either side by a double row of such oaks as england alone can produce under the most favourable circumstances of soil aided by the nurturing hand of man and three or four centuries of time
