Rethinking meditation provides a new theoretical and historical approach to Buddhist and Buddhist derived meditative practices it shows how rather than coming down to us unchanged from the time of the Buddha the standard articulation of mindfulness as bare non judgmental attention to the present moment is a distillation of particular strands of classical Buddhist thought that have combined with western ideas to create a unique practice tailored to modern forms of thought and ways of life part genealogical study and part philosophical argument it inquires into some of the widespread assumptions about how meditation works and what it does presenting a view of meditative practices as technologies of the self embedded in cultural forms of life it shows that the relationship between meditative practices and cultural context is much more crucial than is suggested in typical contemporary articulations which often emphasize transcendence of cultural conditioning and achieving objective internal access to the contents of consciousness meditation McMahan argues is always situated in social contexts and draws from repertoires of cultural categories concepts and values sometimes accommodating them and sometimes resisting them rethinking meditation also considers the scientific study of meditation and meditation in relation to modern articulations of secularism freedom authenticity appreciation and interdependence it also examines the potential for meditation to enhance autonomy and addresses recent attempts to bring meditative practices to bear on social political and environmental issues
