Paws for Thought 1997-03-01

once upon a time i existed without a pet around my home i think of those days as the dark ages then the enlightenment arrived with a dog called charlie and a cat called spite they have become my firm friends and companions they bring happiness and laughter to every day that i ve been with them they are far better stress busters than bubble wrap even when i want a little bit of peace and quiet and they won t let me they unfailingly offer unconditional affection at all times unless you are my postman they are clever and intuitive and charlie and i both know the golden rule the cat is the boss this book is a humorous set of recollections about my life and times with my cat and dog any animal lover will share my delight in co existing with two animals that have their very own perceptions of what a pets life should be like if your ideas do not match with theirs then they will soon do so the book contains a wealth of really good advice on how to train and deal with your pets it may do no good whatsoever

i wrote paws for thought a whiskerful collection of poetry to combine two of my greatest loves cats and poetry as an educator my foremost goal is to ensure that my students have access to appropriate resources and excellent pedagogy while compiling my own poetry i read fascinating articles about the importance of poetry in the classroom i was especially inspired by an edutopia article in which matthew james friday an international teacher writes about poetry broaden ing reading choices and providing new english speakers a less intimidating opportunity to write in english friday this statement resonated with me as i work with many students for whom english is a second language since i have experience working with children of all backgrounds and abilities i recognize the importance of making language accessible promoting accessible language must include supporting varied forms of writing children s poetry as a teaching tool an article published in the clearing house and written by richard l sartore details the poetic deficiencies in our modern classrooms he describes the importance of rhyme and rhythm in child development by making connections to nursery rhymes sartore expresses that youngsters delight in listening to the sounds of poetry even when the words are not understood sartore as our children s attention spans continue to decrease we need to become more creative in the ways in which we incorporate written art an engaging written form should be celebrated as we connect with students poetry should be used to inspire and support children as ideas flow through the classroom i invite you to explore the resources referenced in previous pages and include poetry in your lesson plans your students deserve it
