structure this analysis touches on two fundamental questions what are the sources of income inequality and what are the disincentive effects of attempts to produce a more equal income distribution the papers in part ii proceed from the common observation that the dissimilarity in worker skills and employer demands often tempers the outcomes that would be expected in frictionless labor markets and the last section of the handbook deals explicitly with the role of institutional structures e g trade unions that now form an important part of modern labor economics for more information on the differentials in labour market outcomes covering key areas such as occupational segregation informality part time work and gender wage gaps while women s participation to the labour market is relatively high in africa compared to other regions of the world the examples of cameroon and mali suggest it varies significantly within the continent the data also show that the differential between the two countries in terms of women s participation is driven by the differential in education levels the analysis also reveals that noticeable gender differences can be observed in the employment patterns while men are more likely to be salaried workers women are more often unpaid family workers however in both countries informal employment is the norm for both sexes gender gaps in monthly earnings are found to be much bigger for self employed than for wage workers a result that is consistent with other studies although education of both women and men is likely to play an important role
